Alannah lands on Rundle

FASHION designer and frill queen Alannah Hill follows the mantra "anything goes" when it comes to dressing up, but it's a firm no-no when it comes to tie-dye.

"I think if you have a sense of style and mischief about yourself you can look great in anything," she says. "The one thing that I have never cared for and wished had never been invented was tie-dye. I see tie-dye things and I sort of want to scream. . . It always makes one look slightly mad and like you don't care about anything."

The fashion pixie, who is never seen without lashings of make-up and trademark bouffant hairdo, says she is still nervous when it comes to meeting new people.

But her Adelaide fans were thrilled to see her in the flesh at last night's highly anticipated opening of her boutique on Rundle St, the latest in a string of high-end fashion stores including Lisa Ho, Jack London and Zimmermann.

"I am a little nervous about meeting everyone as underneath it all I am quite shy," Alannah says. "I'm really just an introvert pretending to be an extrovert."

While fashion is her life, Alannah's son Edward, 8, who she had with the founder of menswear label Jack London, Karl Bartl, is not interested in it one bit.

"He (Edward) told me his passion is acting and also he wants to be a policeman," she says.

And her fashion advice? "A woman should never leave the house without a sense of fear or a sense of hope," she says. "I try and pack that into my very high hairdo as I rely on these emotions to get me through the day."

A tougher kind of Guy

GUY Sebastian is trying to shake off his good-boy image.

The soon-to-be X Factor judge, who is performing in the US, recently bought a Harley-Davidson motorbike.

It's a far cry from the angelic image the former Adelaidean has been trying to lose since winning the first series of the now-defunct Australian Idol.

Romance in France

ADELAIDE glamour couple Steve Dundon and Christabel Buder, above, have got engaged.

The Moët Hennessy state manager and Pride Models creative director are overseas for business and pleasure.

Christabel filled in family and friends on the good news via Facebook: "Happiest day of my life . . . the man of my dreams proposed to me in a French provincial village and then surprised me with news that he has flown in my mum and dad who are meeting us in Nice tomorrow!! Am I dreaming?"
